In every case of unusually low blood pressure before anemia of the brain, there were concomitant manifestations of indisposition. Evidence for central mechanism. The precise extent of recovery is more or less immaterial—even the question as to whether or not any recovery has occurred is, from the point of view of these experiments, of secondary importance. That a certain level of blood pressure is being maintained after transection of the cord and that this pressure is ultimately sufficient for the performance of the usual metabolic processes is indubitable. The matter of prime importance is the central mechanism which is responsible for the maintenance of this pressure, whatever it may be. Does it lie in the medulla oblongata or is it to be found in the cells of origin in the spinal cord? The evidence for the location of the central mechanism in the medulla lies in the results obtained by ligation of the head arteries, by stimulation of certain afferent nerves before and during cerebral anemia, and in the effect of excision of the stellate ganglia or section of the extrinsic, cardiac nerves before and after occlusion of the head arteries. It is obvious that the occurrence of a significant rise of blood pressure on ligation of the head arteries is undoubted evidence that the medulla oblongata is able to affect either the rate of the heart or the caliber of the blood vessels, or both. Control experiments have shown that...
