A remarkable portrait, which I attribute to Nathaniel Plimer, is to be found in the collection of Mr. A. A. de Pass, the collector who also owns what is in my opinion the finest head of a man by Andrew, as I have mentioned in my last chapter. There are no initials on this miniature, and the face is unusually sharply cut and well modelled for the work of Nathaniel. The countenance of the man is very white and cold, his features are hard, and not so expressive as were those of Mr. Sprot, but the work is very similar, and the effect is almost as good, although not so pleasing by reason of its strange coldness and want of life. The portrait is in an original frame, with a hinged glass cover, and well repays close examination, but...
